Our volunteers are integral to our service delivery and help by providing a listening ear, taking part in research projects, raising awareness of RA and JIA and their impact, providing administrative backup and much more!

About the role

We are looking for people across the UK to participate on advisory boards and take part in online focus groups. This will be ad-hoc activity and volunteers will be chosen according to their suitability for the project, for e.g. if a focus group is researching patient experiences when first diagnosed, newly diagnosed volunteers will be asked if they would like to participate.

You will receive full training and induction to fulfil this role.

Key activities you will be involved in:

- Completing pre-work (eg questionnaires) prior to a focus group or advisory board meeting.
- Participating in online focus groups or advisory board meetings.
- Giving feedback on project proposals and creative ideas.

The ideal candidate should be able to commit for a year initially. The hours will vary depending on the project but they will usually be for 2-3 hours per week over the course of the activity.

Focus groups and advisory board meetings usually take place during the week, but some may be in the evenings or at weekends.

What you will gain from the role

- You will be making a real difference to those people affected by RA.
- You will have an opportunity to engage with respected charity.
- You'll receive a full induction and training programme.
- Ongoing support and supervision.
- Reimbursement of out-of-pocket expenses as defined in NRAS's volunteer policy.

What we are looking for

- An interest in RA and current treatments and research.
- Ideally able to commit for a year initially. This role will involve 2-3 hours volunteering on an ad hoc basis.
- Access to a computer and phone.
- Confident talking about your experiences of living with RA and expressing your views and opinions.
