General medicine information

People diagnosed with RA will often be on multiple medications. In addition to disease control, there may be medications for symptom control or other health conditions. You may also need general information about how to report side effects or which vaccinations you can have.

As well as the drugs prescribed by your rheumatologist to manage your RA and its symptoms, you may also be on medications for related complications. You may also need specific guidance on immunisations, because for many, due to the drugs you are taking, you will not be able to have the most live vaccines.

The number of drugs being prescribed could also be expensive to have to pay for on a regular basis if you live in an area of the UK where prescriptions are not free, and you may need advice on how to reduce prescription costs.

Medicines in rheumatoid arthritis

We believe it is essential that people living with RA understand why certain medicines are used, when they are used and how they work to manage the condition.

Immunisation for people with rheumatoid arthritis

People living with RA need to take care to protect themselves against infections. The risk of infections, including common colds, but also serious infections such as flu or pneumonia, can be high. Medications both alter the body's immune system, reducing the ability to fight off infections, and they can also become severe.

Keep taking the pills

Adherence is often easier said than done. In broadest terms it is defined as “the extent to which a patient follows the directions of those who order or prescribe the drug therapy; and whether it relates to taking medication, following a diet, or using medical devices, no doubt that it can require psychological stamina.

Photosensitivity

Photosensitivity causes a reaction to sunlight and can be caused by health conditions and medications. RA is not, by itself, a condition that would make you more sensitive to the sun, but a number of medications are considered photosensitive.

Remission

Unlike some other conditions, remission in RA does not mean that your disease has completely gone.
It is more like a dormant volcano, able to erupt again, but currently stable.
